I'm glad you liked it and that it was useful to you. Still, the data offer another lesson to policymakers. Governments can sometimes push more people into poverty in an effort to boost growth — even if they don't really want to. Take the United States: Federal and state welfare-reform plans in the 1990s led to steep cuts in food stamps and other government benefits for low-income people. It was part of an effort to reduce government spending, but the effect was to push people below the poverty line and into a so-called poverty trap. One study shows that from 1995 to 2000, the year the food-stamp cuts began to be implemented, annual poverty rates in the United States grew from 16.6 percent to 17.5 percent. AD AD It's a cautionary tale. Yes, tax increases and spending cuts are painful, but the impact can sometimes be worse, according to the data. And, crucially, the United States is very far from a new normal. The Obama-era spike in poverty rates occurred almost entirely in 2010, when the Great Recession kicked in. Today's poverty rates are hardly unprecedented. Now, some good news for policymakers. National poverty rates have fallen since the Great Recession, and when they're at their lowest point, they've done so steadily. The share of Americans living below the poverty line dipped in 2010, as did its rate, and neither percentage changed much over the next six years. This was not true in the 1990s. Some argue that these declines are simply a testament to the impressive recovery from the Great Recession, a recovery that federal and state policymakers are hardly, if ever, incentivized to aid. AD AD But there's strong evidence to suggest it has something to do with federal and state policy. b7e8fdf5c8

System Requirements: - Windows 2000/XP/VistaThe present invention relates to a semiconductor device and a method for fabricating the same, and more particularly, to a semiconductor device having a metal wiring and a method for fabricating the same. In a semiconductor device, a semiconductor substrate such as a silicon substrate or an insulating film substrate made of, for example, SiO<sub>2</sub> or silicon nitride is used as a base member. Metal films such as polysilicon, tungsten, aluminum, copper or the like are laminated on the base member by using the sputtering method, the chemical vapor deposition (CVD) method, or the like. Then, contact holes or interconnection grooves are formed in the metal films. After that, an interlayer dielectric film is formed on the entire surface of the metal film except the contact holes or the grooves. Via holes for electrically connecting the metal wiring formed on the interlayer dielectric film and the metal wiring on the base member are formed at a predetermined position in the interlayer dielectric film. The metal wiring on the interlayer dielectric film and the metal wiring on the base member are electrically connected by filling the via holes with a metal material such as aluminum, copper or the like. In the above-described fabricating method, a dual damascene process or a SAC (Self Aligned Contact) process is mainly used as a method for forming a metal wiring. In a SAC process, a chemical etching method is used. In a dual damascene process, a chemical etching method and a dual damascene process are used together. In a chemical etching method, a photo resist film
